Rudolf Steiner, founder of Waldorf education, formulated the educational task of the arts in the following way:

“Children need art – both fine arts and poetry, and music.

And there is a way of being actively engaged in both sorts that is suitable for children in their preschool years. ...Art exists for its own sake. Teachers should love art so much that they do not want this experience to be lost to children. They will then see how the children grow through their experiences in art. It is art that awakens their intelligence to full life.”
